Portobello Tower, designed c1739-69 by an unkown architect, was commissoned by Henry Vernon and unveiled in 1769. It lies in a field on hill 550 metres south of Hilton Hall. Built in three stages between 1739 and 1739, the Portobello Tower has hexagonal piers and is enriched with herringbone pattern tooling, moulded plinth and storey bands. The ground floor doorway to the south has a raised and headed architrave and the lintel is raised up to a keystone. On the north side of the tower directly opposite the door is a niche with a similar surround containing a marble plaque. The Portobello Tower is the focus of the main view from Hilton Hall and might give the impression that the celebrated Admiral Vernon, victor of Porto Bello, was one of the Vernons of Hilton. This is not so. Henry Vernon of Hilton erected the Tower to commemorate the occasion, but the Admiral was only a very distant cousin, linked four generations previously via a female line. The English were excited at the news, more than 250 varieties of commemorative medal were struck, and "The Vernon's Head" became a favourite sign for public houses. So great was the popularity the outspoken and irascible old Admiral earned by his victory that it is understandable that even a distant relation would have been proud to raise an appropriate memorial. The tower, some distance from Hilton Hall, was put up to commemorate Admiral Vernon's victory over the Spaniards in 1739. Edward Vernon entered the navy in 1701 but when not engaged on active service was an M.P., sitting for various constituencies. He attacked Walpole for pusillanimity towards Spain, his own motto being "No Peace with Spain". In 1739 he challenged the Government to let him attempt the capture of Porto Bello with only six ships. His challenge was accepted, probably in the hope of discrediting him, but he won a brilliant victory and became a popular hero. In 1740 he led a disastrous expedition against Carthegena. In "Roderick Random", Smollett gives a bitterly critical account of this expedition. In spite of his gallantry and ability, Vernon was an opinionated character, constantly in conflict with the civil authorities. After publishing angry pamphlets criticising his official chiefs, he was struck off the list of flag officers in 1746. He continued to sit in Parliament until his death in 1757. Admiral Vernon's more lasting contribution to the affairs of the navy was his memorandum of 1740, forbidding the serving of raw spirits to his ships' companies. Although in home waters the daily ration was a gallon of beer, in the West Indies a half pint of brandy, rum or arrack had been substituted, resulting in serious drunkenness and crime among seamen there. Admiral Vernon ordered that the allowance of spirits should only be given with an accompanying quart of water, and divided into two servings every day, morning and late afternoon. Although it was speedily adopted throughout the service, this ruling was less well received by the seamen. They called the diluted mixture 'grog', as 'Old Grog' was the Admiral's nickname - from the boat cloak he habitually wore, which was made of grogram, a coarse woven fabric of silk and wool. It was said "Perhaps the greatest improvement to discipline and efficiency ever produced by one stroke of the pen". On the north side of the tower directly opposite the door is a niche with similar surround containing a marble plaque inscribed: "THIS TOWER WAS ERECTED BY HENRY VERNON OF HILTON PARK BORN 13th SEPTEMBER 1718, DIED 1765 T0 COMMEMORATE THE CAPTURE OF PORTOBELLO WITH SIX SHIPS OF THE LINE NOV 22nd 1739 BY ADIMRAL VERNON BORN 12th NOVEMBER 1681 DIED 1757. IN 1763 A monument WAS ERECTED T0 ADMIRAL VERNON IN WESTMINSTER ABBEY A.L.V. 1911. [info from Public Monument and Sculpture Association National Recording Project]
